Facsimile reprint of a catalogue of the Ancient British and foreign-related collections which were on display at the British Museum in 1925, representing the period from about 500 BC to well beyond the Roman invasion of Britain. Split into two equal parts, the first considers all the evidence from continental Europe with particular attention to the La Tene and Hallstatt cultures; the second is devoted to the evolution of native British art and antiquities with much cross-referencing to their European counterparts. The use of a chemical template to control the spatial arrangement of reactants revolutionized the synthesis of mechanically interlocked molecules. The recently developed 'active metal template' strategy, in which transition metal ions act as both the template to guide interlocking and as the catalyst for the covalent bond forming reaction that captures the interlocked structure, has several advantages in comparison with traditional 'passive template' approaches. In contrast with passive template approaches the active template strategy is more efficient, completing the assembly of the interlocked structure in one step instead of two and in some cases requiring only a substoichiometric amount of metal template. In addition, fewer permanent recognition sites are required and in certain cases the active template reaction can shed light on mechanistic details of related metalcatalyzed processes and act as a conduit for reaction discovery. This Thesis will discuss the expansion of this new methodology in two main directions: firstly, exploration of new active metal template reactions, specifically the application of a novel Ni catalyzed  $sp^3-sp^3$  C-C bond forming reaction, and secondly, the application of previously developed active template reactions to the synthesis of agrochemical-based [2]rotaxanes and other architectures, macrobicyclic [3]rotaxanes, [2]catenanes and a trefoil knot.
